Computertomography is a modern x-Ray examination that can show many details of internal organs, bones, soft tissues and blood vessels. During the scan thin cross-sectional slices of the body part in question can be viewed and interpreted on a computer screen by the radiologist.

During the examination you will lie on a table which moves slowly through the scanner. The examination including all preparations lasts about 5-20 minutes. For some abdominal examinations it is necessary to drink a contrast solution 1 hour before the examination to make the intestines visible.

Contrast agent

Furthermore, a contrast agent injected into an arm vessel may be needed to see if there are any additional pathological conditions in the organs. The contrast agent is a diluted iodine solution which is usually well tolerated. A warm sensation in the body is a normal feeling after the injection. Allergic reactions are very rare; sometimes there may be a mild skin reaction such as itching. Very rarely, a life-threatening reactions may occur. Our staff is trained to quickly treat such a life-threatening conditions.

YES NO

I agree to the injection of a contrast agent.

If you have a thyroid disease, an additional thyroid medication may be necessary before the injection of the contrast agent. The contrast agent is passed through the kidneys, therefore it can not be used if you have a kidney disorder. In any case, it is recommended to drink a lot of liquid after the examination. Diabetic patients taking pills containing Metformin should stop taking these pills for a period of 48 hours after the examination. After the examination is completed, you will be asked to wait until the radiologist verifies that the image quality is high enough for accurate interpretation.
